Why do social actors turn to literary texts whenever they seek to enforce normative changes?

How can we explain the vast quantity of polemical literature published since the invention of the printing press?

How can literary theory and history deal with this kind of material?

Pierre-Héli Monot is Professor of Transnational American Studies (Political Theory, Aesthetics, and Public Humanities) at the Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität of Munich. He is the Principal Investigator of the ERC Starting Grant "The Arts of Autonomy." He has held Visiting Fellowships at Harvard, Brown, Oxford, and King's College London.
