Assessing SLI in bilingual populations: making the impossible possible.

The focus of the talk is to present empirical evidence as to how language impairment presents in bilingual children where one language spoken is Cypriot Greek, an understudied variety on both linguistic-descriptive grounds and the empirical basis of speech and language impairments. Overall, I hope to inform the audience on (i) how SLI manifests in bilingual children and (ii) the major clinical issues influencing the assessment and diagnosis of SLI in childhood bilingualism (iii) in countries where the main spoken language is not only understudied and not codified or even officially acknowledged but (iv) is used in parallel with an official standard variety.
